

Books

The goal of this analysis is to explore book genre popularity. Some questions I'll try to answer are: Have genre tastes changed over time? Does genre popularity have a pattern in the course of a year? Do demographics such as age or gender tend to report reading the same types of books?

The Data

This data was collected via a public API from a popular book social network. All information is self reported, including demographic information, books read, and genre categorization. Unfortunately it is not necessary when reporting having read a book to categorize it by genre but fortunately many users do.

Two types of data were collected: User data, and information about books users self-reported to be “currently reading”

A note about github: The collected CSV files are too large to share on github. However, you can see exactly how I collected the data at my repo called ‘goodreads-analyses’ I’m also happy to share the data I collected if you would like to reproduce my analyses or work with the data yourself. A word of caution: I collected this data too quickly for their tastes and ended up getting IP banned for about a month. Consume at your own risk.

User Data

head(users)

Genres

For each book title collected I also collected the names of the “shelves” it was added to. Many users sort their shelves by genre so this seems to be an adequate way to assign a single common genre to each title with a little processing.

First I’ll find the most common shelf names and decide upon a set of genres to sort all the titles into, if possible.

      genre.counts[genre] <- 1
    } else {
